A multilingual website is one that is presented in more than one language (to be concise, multilingual means more than two, while exactly two is bilingual). Al-Ameen College of Law website, www.alameenlaw.com is of 5 languages ie. English, Tamil, Urdu, Kannada & Hindi, this includes the state language, National Language & other states language. However, only the written component of a language will be considered. This becomes significant when various spoken dialects are different, whilst the written language is common. One such example is Hindi, however, the distinction between traditional and simplified characters is made. Whether or not one considers differences to be significant between the languages as to warrant separate presentations.

Al-Ameen College law has a very well multi lingual website of college presenting multilingual websites to a range of audiences involves more than translating the text from one language to another (which itself is not a straightforward matter). When we learn a language, we do so in the context of a culture", and show that all levels of a communicative interaction are influenced by cultural factors, as in of. Therefore our website has been created taking into consideration the cultural norms, of which the text will form a part of an integrated whole. The text is then translated into another language, then the overall language of the text in website also changes .This is because the usability of the site becomes user friendly as per the choice of the language. The usability will change due to the user's new language having different culturally based expectations. This helps in the existence between language, cultural context and usability. Thus, our web designer a multilingual website, the cultural context of the audience needs to be taken into consideration. This is particularly important in the light of global-commerce efforts where success of business is dependent upon the successful interaction with a multitude of imagined audiences via electronic means.
